Creating A Survival Guide

Today is our fifth day on this island and we are still alive. We have spotted numerous ships, sailing by the shore. This might be our chance to be rescued. Welcome back to our blog in which we will discuss how we were close to being rescued by marine search and find crew.

Survival Manual and Personal Reflection

I would like to use this opportunity to share some tips that I thought can be beneficial for anyone in such situations. Always have a certain type of boundary around the spot where fire is, to avoid any further destruction on the island. Use a map to sketch out a layout of map to remember where your necessities lay. Lastly, to prevent any sort of contamination for food and water supplies, always eat them fresh and don't try to preserve them for a long time. Create the washroom system somewhere close to plants but away from freshwater.

To recall, we all had a specific role on the island which we would switch every other day. The most fearful role I could think of would be, 'The Watcher'. Their role was to stay up all night and guard the shelter and storage area where we had our food. It was difficult to remain outside, in complete darkness watching for wild animals and other things. It was scary to stay out when there was a monster on loose. From all this experience, I learned a very valuable lesson that there won't be an adult to guide throughout your every step of life. You have to take charge and responsibility at some point. When you are given responsibility out of the blue, it's hard to hold the burden and can end up breaking you. It is best to know and fulfil your responsibilities as soon as possible. There is no certainty that tomorrow will even come.
